Years in antitrust: 13

I enjoy that the practice of antitrust is so much about people and their behaviour – what motivates them and where their incentives lie. There is also very little about antitrust law and enforcement that is truly set in stone, which allows for a great deal of creativity.

Take every opportunity that you can to observe the practice of other lawyers. So much of antitrust is about identifying patterns and using them to predict the future, which is a skill that can only be learned by harnessing collective experience. Women are more visible and more influential than ever before, particularly in private practice. We are increasingly recognised as leaders and are sought out for our expertise, perspective and judgement.
