Years in antitrust: 25

It was a great honour returning to the US Department of Justice's antitrust division to serve as a deputy assistant attorney general during the Obama Administration after having been fortunate to work there as a counsel during the Bush Administration, each time alongside the agency's outstanding career lawyers, economists and professional staff. It was also exciting to represent the US as a delegate in international settings, such as the OECD's Competition Committee meetings in Paris.

It seems like there are significantly more women in senior antitrust positions in law firms, in-house, and enforcement agencies than there were 25 years ago, which is exciting and represents progress. There is still work to do, however, to make our field more inclusive and equitable, including with respect to women of colour.
